CHAPTER 1

When Your Body Keeps Going but Your Soul Is Tired

You are still showing up. You still go to work, still answer messages, still sit in church on Sunday. If someone asked how you were doing, you would say "fine," and it would not exactly be a lie. Nothing has collapsed. But somewhere underneath the routine, something has gone quiet. Prayer feels like talking into a room where nobody is home. The Bible on your phone has become one more app you scroll past. You are not angry with God. You are just tired in a place that sleep does not reach.

If that describes you, I want you to hear something before we go any further: you are not a failure, and you are not a fraud. You are a person whose body has kept moving after the soul asked for a rest it never received. That gap between an active life and an exhausted spirit is exactly what this guide is written to close.

A tiredness sleep cannot fix

There is a difference between being physically tired and being soul-tired. Physical tiredness may improve after sleep or a quiet weekend. Soul-tiredness often remains even after the body has rested. You can lie on the sofa for two days and still get up on Monday feeling empty, because your body may not be the only part of you that needs care.

Soul-tiredness usually shows up in small ways first. You notice you have stopped enjoying things that used to feed you. Worship music plays and you feel nothing. You catch yourself being short with people you love. You pray for other people out of habit but cannot remember the last time you prayed honestly about yourself. Decisions that used to be simple now feel heavy, and you put them off. You may even feel a low-grade guilt about all of this, which only makes you more tired.

Most Christians respond to this by trying harder. More devotionals. A new reading plan. A resolution to get up earlier. Sometimes that helps for a week. Usually it becomes one more thing you are failing at, and the exhaustion deepens.

Trying harder is not always the answer. You may already have spent all the energy you possess. What is missing is not another spiritual assignment, but unhurried, undistracted time in the presence of God, with nothing to prove and nothing to perform. That is what a retreat gives back.

Elijah under the broom tree

The Bible does not hide this condition. It gives us a man who had it badly.

In 1 Kings 18, the prophet Elijah stands on Mount Carmel against 450 prophets of Baal. He prays, fire falls from heaven, and the gathered people fall on their faces and confess that the LORD is God. It is the greatest public victory of his life. Then, in 1 Kings 19:1–4, Queen Jezebel sends him a death threat, and this same man runs into the wilderness, sits down under a broom tree, and asks God to let him die. "It is enough; now, O LORD, take away my life, for I am no better than my fathers" (1 Kings 19:4).

Notice the timing. Elijah did not break down after a defeat. He broke down after a triumph. His body had been running on adrenaline through a drought, a public confrontation, the execution of Baal's prophets (1 Kings 18:40), and a long run ahead of Ahab's chariot to Jezreel (1 Kings 18:46). The moment it stopped, everything he had been carrying caught up with him. His exhaustion did not mean Jezebel's threat was imaginary. It meant he was trying to face a real danger while physically depleted, emotionally overwhelmed, and alone. That is how soul-tiredness works. It does not always arrive when things are going wrong. It often arrives the moment you finally slow down.

What God did next should shape how you think about the days ahead. He did not rebuke Elijah. He did not give him a sermon on faith. 1 Kings 19:5–8 says an angel touched him, gave him bread and water, and let him sleep. Then fed him again. Only after Elijah had rested and eaten, twice, did God lead him to Horeb and speak to him. And when God spoke, it was not in the wind, the earthquake, or the fire, but in "a still small voice" (1 Kings 19:12, KJV), a low whisper that Elijah could only hear because everything else had gone quiet.

God met an exhausted prophet with rest first and direction second. Most of us want direction while skipping the rest that may prepare us to receive it. Elijah's story reminds us that God cares for the exhausted person before asking what that person will do next. This retreat will honour that same order.

Jesus and the invitation to come away

Elijah is not the only example. In Mark 6:30–31, the disciples return from their first mission trip, full of reports about what they had done and taught. Crowds are pressing so hard that the text says they had no time even to eat. Jesus does not say, "Well done, now keep going." He says, "Come away by yourselves to a desolate place and rest a while."

The Greek word translated "desolate," erēmos, describes a solitary or uninhabited place, a place away from crowds and ordinary demands. It is the same word used for the wilderness where Jesus himself went to pray (Mark 1:35). Jesus regularly withdrew to such places (Luke 5:16), and he invited his closest followers into that same rhythm. If the Son of God needed it, you are not being weak by needing it too.

Then there is the invitation almost every tired Christian has heard but few have actually accepted. In Matthew 11:28-30, Jesus says, "Come to me, all who labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.

Take my yoke upon you, and learn from me, for I am gentle and lowly in heart, and you will find rest for your souls."

Read that last phrase again. Not rest for your body. Rest for your soul. Jesus names the exact tiredness you are feeling and says he is the one who can lift it. But an invitation only becomes rest when you show up. This guide is a structured way of showing up.

What a spiritual reset is, and is not

A spiritual reset is not an attempt to manufacture an emotional encounter with God. It is not a way to force God to speak, and it is not a test of how spiritual you are. It is a deliberate pause from noise, responsibility, and performance so that you can become honest before God again. You may experience tears, clarity, peace, conviction, or nothing dramatic at all. The goal is not to produce a feeling. The goal is to make yourself available to God.

What this guide will ask of you

Over the coming pages I will walk with you the way I would walk with someone who came into my office and admitted they were running on empty. There will be teaching, but not a lot of it.

Mostly there will be Scripture to sit with, honest questions to answer, guided prayers, stretches of silence, and space to write. Some sessions will be gentle. Some will go to hard places: grief you have not processed, people you have not forgiven, shame you have carried longer than you realise. We go there because lasting rest is difficult while so much remains unnamed and carried alone.

This guide is designed primarily as a three-day retreat. If possible, give yourself those three days; the slower pace allows each stage to do its work. I also recognise that work, family, health, or caregiving responsibilities may make that impossible. For that reason, Part Four includes adapted formats for a three-hour reset, a full-day retreat, an at-home version, couples, small groups, and pastors.

One more thing, and it matters. If you are thinking about harming yourself or believe you may be in immediate danger, do not begin this retreat alone. Contact emergency services or a crisis service in your country, and tell a trusted person who can remain with you. If you are facing an uncontrolled addiction, abuse, severe depression, or unresolved trauma, please read Chapter 5 before beginning. Silence can bring buried pain to the surface, and you may need a qualified counsellor, doctor, or trusted pastoral leader alongside you. Seeking help is not a failure of faith. It is an act of wisdom and courage.

Before you turn the page

Take two minutes. Not to plan or to fix anything, just to answer honestly.

1. When did you last feel close to God, not in a service or a meeting, but on your own? What was different then?

2. What is one thing you have kept doing for God while feeling nothing? Do not judge it. Just name it.
3. Elijah said, "It is enough." If you were completely honest with God right now, what would your sentence be? Write your answers somewhere you can return to. You will read them again on the final day and notice what has shifted, what has become clearer, and what God may still be inviting you to face.

You have kept going for a long time. For the next few days, you are allowed to stop.
